

Dear FCC members,

America's strong economy is based on the free enterprise system. If you want to get ahead and stay profitable then meet the customer's demands. Satellite radio is the newest version of radio that meets consumer's demands and should not be penalized for its uniqueness. If traditional radio stations wish to compete - let them change their own products instead of asking a governmental agency to run interference. In satellite TV we can choose to watch The Weather Channel or our local forecast from a local channel. The key word here is "choose". I see nothing wrong with a satellite radio station offering a variety of choices to their customers. I would recommend that the FCC let these two industries "fight it out" the American way - by competition and meeting the consumers needs.

Sincerely,

Carol L. Jacobs, MD
